Paul Scott: New American Scenery exhibition at the Albany Institute of History & Art

Scott, who lives and works in Cumbria, United Kingdom, creates printed ceramics that blur the boundaries between art, craft, and design. His works are included in numerous museum collections and have been exhibited throughout Europe and the United States. Scott is represented by Ferrin Contemporary.

He has studied the Albany Institute’s collection of historical transfer-printed ceramics, paintings, drawings, and prints and debuts new works inspired by these collections in the exhibition. Scott’s first visit to the Albany Institute in 2016 revealed a wealth of materials, including a mammoth transfer-printed jug made in the 1820s for Troy merchant Horace Jones. With dozens of other historic transferware ceramics, and collections rich in landscape art, including Hudson River School paintings, the Albany Institute offered Scott abundant inspiration for his New American Scenery series.

“New American Scenery references and updates the original transferware made by British factories,” Scott explains. “My work is a personal response to being in and traveling in America.”

The images that Scott creates for his ceramic plates, platters, and pitchers depict unsettling views of nuclear power plants, landfills, abandoned industrial sites, aging urban centers, and isolating walls. As representations of the American landscape, they suggest a subversion of the picturesque aesthetic—the unpicturesque picturesque—and a new, disturbing norm, a new way of envisioning ourselves, our physical environment, and our society.
Additionally, Scott reworks historic printed ceramics through collage and the process of erasing, reprinting, and reglazing pieces to incorporate additions. The past and present join together on single works where airplanes soar across platters and wind turbines loom over pastoral fields.

Doug McCombs, Albany Institute Chief Curator and curator for the exhibition notes, “Paul Scott: New American Scenery brings together historical ceramics, paintings, and drawings from the Institute’s collection and pairs them with Scott’s contemporary works. Together, they create a dialogue between past and present—between the romanticized and nostalgic views of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries and the realities of modern-day America.”

“The exhibition provides viewers with an engaged experience, where images emerge and delight in unexpected ways,” McCombs added. “As you move through the show you experience an unfolding of history and objects and their entanglement with current ecological issues. The exhibition encourages conversations about the American landscape, environmentalism, and our place within these histories.”

Multi-year funding from the Alturas Foundation through an artist-in-residence grant allowed Scott to travel through the U.S. to research these historic transfer-printed ceramics. Additional support was provided by his gallery, Ferrin Contemporary. Research into transferware archives at Spode, V&A Wedgwood, and the V&A Prints & Drawings Department in London was made possible by funding from Arts Council England.

Founded in 1791, the Albany Institute of History & Art is New York’s oldest museum. Its collections document the Hudson Valley as a crossroads of culture, influencing the art and history of the region, the state, and the nation. With more than 35,000 objects and one million documents in the library, it is an important resource for the region, giving our community a sense of the part the Hudson Valley played in the American story, and our own place in history. Permanent and temporary exhibitions are open year-round and create a sense of place, allowing visitors to meet the people who helped shape this region. Among the museum’s best-known collections are the 19th century Hudson River School landscape paintings by artists like Thomas Cole and Frederic Church.
